

I'm very happy. My my son graduates this year and he is going to go into the military which I'm very proud of. They'll straighten him out, won't they? Uhhuh.

Yeah, they will.

His whole life he wanted to work on tanks, you know, and that's great. I'm proud of him. I mean, I'm I'm afraid as a mother, you know, as any mother would be with the world situation as it is.

And I'll be honest, I'm afraid to get that phone call one day from the Pentagon. Like, hello.

He did what? He totaled a tank.

No, no, no, no. Don't tell me he hit a deer.

Big sand deer. Yeah. The other day. Um, my one of his high school teachers invited me to speak at career day.

That was my reaction.

She'd actually invited four parents to come and speak. Uh, one was a doctor and a dentist and a lawyer and then me.

You remember that little song? I think it was on Sesame Street. It said, it goes, "One of these things is not like the other.

Turned out to be me, people.

And they'd asked us to bring something to show the kids, a visual aid is what they call it. And the doctor, he brought this giant skeleton, which was really cool.

And the dentist brought this giant tooth that opened up and showed all the nerve endings.

And the lawyer, he brought another lawyer to represent him. And well, heck, I'm a comic.

I brought a bottle of tequila and a drunk guy named Chuck.

And then it came one point they asked us to describe our a day at work.

I said, "My average day I don't know, kids. I I wake up maybe 1:30, 2 o'clock.

Eat me some lean cuisine, watch Dr. Phil, Oprah, Judge Judy, Joe Brown.

By that time, get dressed, go to the club, be a smart Alec for an hour, drink beer, clock out.

That's a pretty full day for me, kids.
