

The other day. Um, my one of his high school teachers invited me to speak at career day.

That was my reaction.

She'd actually invited four parents to come and speak. Uh, one was a doctor and a dentist and a lawyer and then me.

You remember that little song? I think it was on Sesame Street. It said, it goes, "One of these things is not like the other.

Turned out to be me, people.

And they'd asked us to bring something to show the kids, a visual aid is what they call it. And the doctor, he brought this giant skeleton, which was really cool.

And the dentist brought this giant tooth that opened up and showed all the nerve endings.

And the lawyer, he brought another lawyer to represent him. And well, heck, I'm a comic.

I brought a bottle of tequila and a drunk guy named Chuck.

And then it came one point they asked us to describe our a day at work.

I said, "My average day I don't know, kids. I I wake up maybe 1:30, 2 o'clock.

Eat me some lean cuisine, watch Dr. Phil, Oprah, Judge Judy, Joe Brown.

By that time, get dressed, go to the club, be a smart Alec for an hour, drink beer, clock out.

That's a pretty full day for me, kids.

By the time I left that class, every kid in there wanted to become a comic.

Even the doctor and the dentist wanted to become a comic.

stinking lawyer suing me for pain and suffering.

Now, here in Tennessee, California, do you guys have that take your daughter to work day? Yeah.

Yeah. That's a good program. What it is is you take your daughter to work, they get out of school, they go to work with you, and then the next day they have to go to their class and give an oral report on what they learned.

My daughter didn't even make it to school the next day. We were so hung over.

Oh, by the time we woke up, Judge Judy was on and we blew that day, didn't we, honey? She was all nervous. I said, "Don't worry, I'll write you a note." Principal likes notes from me. Let's see. Let's make it a good one.

Please excuse Harita. She can't handle her tequila.
